Screenshots: Cyclooxygenase-2 expression is required for somatostatin-induced growth inhibition and suppression of the cell-cycle in the HT29 colon cancer cell line. Somatostatin analogs (SSTs) have potent antitumor activity in several cancer types, but the mechanisms by which they exert this activity are not fully understood. We have recently shown that a SST analog, SOM230, is highly effective in a mouse model of colon carcinoma, where it can cause tumor regression. In this study, we demonstrate that tumor regression caused by SOM230 in the mouse is associated with enhanced tumor cell apoptosis and inhibition of cell proliferation, and we also show that SOM230 induces apoptosis in colon cancer cells. In addition, SOM230 suppresses the expression of COX-2, an enzyme that is known to be upregulated in human colon cancer and which has a role in the regulation of apoptosis and cell-cycle progression. The effect of SOM230 on cell-cycle progression is also associated with a reduction of cyclin-dependent kinases. These findings support a role for COX-2 as a mediator of the effect of SOM230 on apoptosis and the cell-cycle in colon cancer cells, and provide the rationale for the use of SOM230 in combination with the selective COX-2 inhibitors as a potential strategy in colon cancer therapy.
